London Leaders take action for a greater London

City Hall, London - 15 October 2007. Mayor of London Ken Livingstone today unveiled a new programme that will celebrate the role Londoners can play in creating a more sustainable city. The 'London Leaders' programme was launched with the announcement of 15 individuals from all walks of London life who will demonstrate what can be done when people work together to achieve positive change. It is hoped that these leaders will act as an inspiration to other Londoners and encourage them to take action in their own communities.

At the launch each of the leaders signed a pledge committing themselves to a key sustainability campaign over the coming year. These include an urban regeneration champion who will be persuading city institutions to adopt 'living roofs' (1), a vicar who is expanding a city farm programme and a director of a refugee support unit who wants to forge links between London refugee organisations.

The London Leaders programme was developed by the London Sustainable Development Commission following an international research programme, which reviewed how other cities are embracing sustainability (2). The research, carried out by Golder Associates on behalf of the London Sustainable Development Commission in Spring 2007, identified the success factors for a truly sustainable city which include leadership, personal capacity building such as skills development, partnership, community participation and innovation.

Over the next 12 months the 15 Leaders will undertake a variety of challenges that show 'sustainability in action' from grass roots through to the boardroom such as an eco-entertainment entrepreneur who wants to develop the world's first sustainable entertainment venue in London. The Leaders are drawn from a broad cross-section of London society including the voluntary sector, academia, arts and entertainment, charities, environmentalists, local government, commerce and the clergy.

Mayor of London Ken Livingstone said: “The London Leaders programme is a pioneering scheme which will provide London communities with the leadership and guidance needed to create sustainable environments and attitudes. A sustainable future requires leaders at all levels, from government to local business, to lead by example. By identifying and supporting these London Leaders I am confident they can inspire communities.”

June Barnes, Chair of the London Sustainable Development Commission said: “Since its inception in 2002 the London Sustainable Development Commission has worked to deliver the Mayor’s vision for London to become the world’s leading sustainable city. It believes that everyone needs to make changes if London is to overcome the particular challenges it faces such as climate change, social and economic inequality and child poverty. We view the London Leaders programme as the first of its kind in the world and believe it will deliver economic, social and environmental benefits and therefore move us further towards the type of city we all want to live in.”

The London Sustainable Development Commission undertook research into successful sustainability projects in other world cities. Many of the successful case studies involved individuals taking responsibility for their actions and making change happen. Political leadership brought results in Curitiba (Brazil) where there is an integrated transport system, in Bogotá (Colombia) where the ‘Actions for Coexistence’ programme facilitated community development and in Gottingen (Germany) where community leadership was the critical ingredient in the development a refugee food garden project that enhanced community integration.
